

Photo by the author

Christopher Bernard

The Long Weekend

childhood of Saturday mornings smells of dirt and daisies and grass and the dawn breeze crisp and chilly through the bedroom window (was there ever ever so much sunlight ever ever so bright?)
Pandie and Sealie and Lionel propped against the pillow muttering jokes and rebellion gambols of wit over the breakfast table don't run too far be back by dinner! later: staring hard at a new sister later still: staring harder at a new brother a book opens, your father leans over your shoulder the jolly sun at noon ambuscades in the blackberry bushes sneak attacks with Frankie and his pretty sister duels with their angry turkey or tossing a beach ball high till it hides the sun dribbling gothic sand into castles and digging down to China then dashing ("Last one in . . .!") toward the summer sea or a sleepy hot blanket on the backyard grass the giggling the bee sting the quarrels the first weeping then evening into puberty: the scarlet sun lashing through deepening woods shadows of music and whispering that chased you like a band of devils under stars stark as glass like the mocking spectres of desire and the mystery of the sadness of the moon . . .

then one morning the move to the big city from the country where everything, even death, is alive to a slippery plinth of stone and so much flashing (the last look back at the house: don't! it'll turn you . . .) and one learned what salt is really made up of and what the thing is that is called "real life" but is it: past the monotonous class bells of school it is only a long Saturday night of sexndrugsnrocknroll writhing forests of arms phantom light shows dexies pot psychedelia and unending screaming of what it shot for and never was able to reach then dead to the world Sundays forgetting what you had never actually known in the riots of the night followed (followed!) by a week of bull sessions would-be revolutionaries aspiring poets and profs pompously envious of the young and marches and cramming war paranoia, man! and fists held high black as ashes as they burned across the sun defy defy!

defy defy!

till Saturday night in the Saturday night came around again and around and around and around and till an almost accidental loss of virginity at a party

on a sofa

or was it under a TV screen finally this is real life (but is it) smeared with ads for Ivory soap, revolution and assassinations it lasted (but who was counting?) in a smog of bad drugs marches informants bombings crazy girlfriends and dancing for a notorious decade then silence and collapse . . .

a thousand years of manhood pass across the ruined choirs the crowds in the streets seething like tides on an earth the size of a dark bottle every moment a prospect of shattering into a bitter solitude mobbed in a homeless city in a war between your will and the world endless as an afternoon naked with light fueled by anger crazy desire and pride (money? no money less money more money more money less money then no money again) real life at last a climb up a rock face to all appearance without end cries of the falling everywhere around you (the grim look across the desk the imploding market) or security and a long hike over a desert of glass (hurrahs fading in the distance) toward the clouds the clouds massing in the west where lightning (war, revolution – but not here) cracks the sky into tribes dressed in gold and blood in a burning film of triumph and defeat triumph and defeat triumph and and a chaos of battle is at least a relief from the boredom till, drenched with sweat, you watch it slink back into your lap where it twitches, back and forth, like a snake in a trap the life you have, the life you had till the first gray hair and the roughening skin till the little wrinkles at the edges of the eyes till the abrupt chill of the iron in the soul for monotonous decades you assumed would last at least forever

then twilight sudden as a curtain . . .

the stunning peacefulness as the sun dissolves reluctantly into the horizon and a warm wind breathes out from the inland toward the scattering clouds and the sea and shades cluster around you like memories in the batting of an eye (so soon? but I had just begun . . . so soon) and you reach out but the railing is gone and where there was always certainty now there is only uncertainty and a silence outside you opens to a silence within memories crumbling like a kaleidoscope its brightly colored stones and friends begin to disappear one by one . . .

and you begin to learn the reason for the sadness of the moon as it rides the sky white as your hair singing a farewell
that seems never to end to the night

Christopher Bernard is co-editor of Caveat Lector. His most recent book is The Socialist's Garden of Verses (Regent Press). His poetry can also be found at his blog, The Bog of St. Philinte.